A BACKYARD LEGEND

For generations, Americans have loved the taste of food cooked on an outdoor grill, and George Stephen was no exception. But back in the 1950's, George had a problem: he hated burned steaks.

George knew why his steaks burned. If the fire got too hot, or if the wind was blowing, juices from the steaks would fall onto the coals, catch fire and then flare up, incinerating the steaks. If the fire was too cool, or if it was raining, the steaks wouldn't cook at all. The fire was just too hard to control.

Well, George had worked at the Weber Brothers Metal Works for nearly twenty years and he knew a lot about the metal shapes the company produced. He started to experiment. He took two different half sphere shapes and fit them together. His friends laughed at his invention and called it "Sputnik," but George had done what he set out to do. The tight-fitting lid with adjustable air vents made it possible to control the temperature inside the grill, and blustery breezes were no longer a threat. No more burned steaks!

In 1952, George started selling "George's Barbecue Kettle," the predecessor of today's entire line up of Weber charcoal and gas grills.

A company which today is devoted full-time to manufacturing and selling high-quality products such as: Weber® Charcoal Grills, Gas Grills and Weber® Accessories.
